Tulare Lake.

A ROMANTIC, WEIRD, AND DREAMY RETREAT-MYSTERIOUS RELIES OF BIRDS OF A PREHIS-TORIC RACE.

[San Francisco Bulletin.] The lake is in Tulare county, in the south-ern part of California. It is reached from this city by a ride of nearly three hundred miles on the Southern Pacific railroad, stepping down at Tulare City. Tulare lake is one of the most singular sheets of water in the State. It is a little tuland sea, being forty miles in length and almost thirty in breadth. Its shores are low, flat, and marshy. You come from the dry plain to the water margin, as a general thing, by so gradual a decline that the water seems to be higher than the land. The dry land of the plain becomes moist, in another mile it is decidedly wet, and in another it is only ankle-deep. Yet there are some bluff banks of five or six feet. If you would take a sail and have not a very light boat, you must select a tain recognition: "Mr. Brown, I believe?" deep-water landing. As a general thing you have your boat in a wagon, and put it into the water wherever you please. Drive your wagon well in; out with your boat; roll up the legs of your pante, and wade in, pushing the boat before you. In awhile she swims, and you may get in. Just take a look around. North and south, a boundless sea and sky; east and west in the distance, forty miles or so, the Sierra Nevada mountains, and the Coast Range. Around you, the lake, without a mark and without a bound. Screaming waterfowl overhead, on the water, near and far off. The duck, goose, pelican, swan, gull, the whole range of waterfowl are there. In the distance the mirage makes them look like stately ships with flying sails. It is a magic lake. The water warm, so warm that in or out you are equally comfortable. The air a little sultry. The breeze, generally light, or not a breath; though rarely Old Boreas blows everything to ruin. The atmosphere is hazy. Clear close around you, but on every side the outlines are lost in mist, and in that mist all things are exaggerated. A swan is a ship, a bunch of tule is an island, an island seems a vast continent. Tulare lake is a world of itself when you are three miles from shore. MISTY ENCHANTMENT AND ENNUI.

The lazy sails must have help, or we shall die right here. But in this warm water, this close, still air, this misty enchantment, we are as lazy as the sails. And so we just paddle along. But all places are alike. Our boat, the centre, the mist, the circumference, the birds, the life. The picture is all one. Fishes are there, too. Great big fishes. And the whole bottom is paved with clams. You can eat them if you are very bungry; but you will never againnever, never! It should have been called Clam lake. Take up a handful of sand, from the bottom, from the top, from the shore, from an island beach, apply your microscope, and three fourths of the grains are clam-shells, broken, powdered clamthells. How long has this work been proceeding? On we go! An island. Yes, there is no mistake, here is an island. A cluster! a group! Like Columbus, we have discovered a new land. Yes, indeed; never before did the foot of a white man mark these shores. We will land; we do so, on the largest. It might be two miles in length, a quarter wide; its highest hills eight feet above the lake. Bushes, coarse gress, thick brush, and a few stunted trees are all we find. There is not a land-animal, not a squirrel, mouse, chipmunk-nothing from the main shore. Two Indian huts of vered by express or mail. basket-work-very neat, ten feet square, eight feet high, walls erect, and a doorway. But no one at home. A CIRCLE OF HUMAN SKULLS.

We look around. What is that? A circle near the centre of the island. It is just raised enough to be visible, eight feet in diameter, and a little centre-piece. The sand has almost covered it-the drifting sand. We dig into it. The circle was of human skulls, apparently just laid on the sand in that form. The centre one was smaller, flucr, and, to our poor judgment, that of a white girl or woman, young and well formed. Several of the teeth were wanting, while not one was missing in the other skulls. The remaining teeth were white and pearly, unlike all the rest. We intended to bring it away, but the mosquitoes did so urge our sudden departure that it was forgotten.

What history is here? These fourteen skulls! This one in the centre, so unlike. How came they here? The buts were unique. Indians do not build like them; and no Indians had been known to visit these islands. No canoes had ever been found about the lake. Perhaps this will ever remain a mystery.

We visited another island more to the west. It was smaller, but had an air of great antiquity. It was just matted thick with grass, rushes, brush, and a few very incient-looking twisted and gnarled trees of the cottonwood species. The highest billock was not more than eight feet above the water. The highest tree-top was not more than twenty feet above that. But so gramped and crocked, dwarfed and deformed were they, that they seemed the pigmies of the vegetable kingdom. Then there were bare spots under these old trees and in patches all over the island.

MILLIONS OF BIRDS.

One half of the space has been kept clear by millions of birds, from the swan and the pelican down to the duck and the snipe. Their nests just littered the ground. It was not the season for eggs or very young birds; but broken shells and dead young ones of every species lay in thousands. Some of the larger nests had been rebuilt, as it were, every year, a little more added, till they stood up as large as a barrel and four feet high. No battle-field was ever four feet high. so rich in dead carcasses, or so lively with the wild screams of the living, with the wild screams of the living, resenting our intrusion. We walked about on dead birds and nests, startling at every turn great feather giants that scarcely deigned to get out of our way, and growled as they went reluctantly off. Every step we took was under protest. The place was sacred. One human skull rewarded our tearch. It was lying on the top of the tround, no other boues about it of that ipecies. Large, thick, masculine, it was kell formed and must have been that of a powerful man. We left this noisy islet for the more new, more quiet, a mere sand. powerful man. We left this noisy islet for | no 18 ine more new, more quiet, a mere sandbank. Here we passed the night, our second night. We had passed the first, or at least part of it, where we found the first skulls. Here we slept in peace on a low sandspit. The mosquitoes did not find us. At daylight we put our prow to the east to return to the main shore. All day we were in that delicious dreamland-water, sky, the white birds, and the closing mist. Here and there would rise on our view a bunch of tules, looking like a majestic forest. Then, in the great distance a small islet, whose bold shore of three feet loomed up like some mighty promontory. At last the shallow water and the lowing of cattle apprised us that we were near shore, but no wagon, house, tree, no familiar object, suggested where we were. Only nearing the eastern shore, that The boat is in the mud, and no sign of
